The results of the expedition will prove of unusual value to anthropology. While some of the links of the SUITS MADE TO ORDER We do not chain of evidence are still wanting, it can now be said with certainty that the Peruvian coast from Chiclayo, in the north, to Yauca, in the south-a distance of over 600 miles-was peopled predominantly before the advent o fthe whites, by the same physical type of Indian. These Indians were of medium height, with short and broad skulls and moderately to strongly developed muscles, according to the locality. The most important fact ascertained in this connection was that both the Chimu and Nascas, two of the foremost cultural groups of ancient Peru, were identical and, as regards physical characteristics, inseparable parts of this coast people. According to their location, the people of old Pern were either fishermen or farmers. They seem to have been organized into numerous political groups, which developed smaller or greater cultural differences according to environment and other influences.

Dwellings Made of Reeds, Some of their smaller dwellings were made of reeds, while larger structures were built of small uncut stones, sundried brick or blocks of abode. Their knowledge of weaving, pottery making and decoration was surprising. They wove from native cotton and llama wool and their designs indicate the changes brought about by time and other influences The native dress consisted principally of a poncho shirt! a loin cloth and sailgals, with simple headgear.

The pre-Columbian Peruvians of the coast knew the uses o fgold, silver and copper and worked these metals to some extent, especially copper, in the manufacture of weapons. Their common weapons were a metal or stone mace, a wooden club, a copper axe and kulfe, the sling, annd in some regions the bo wand arrow. Their implements were the whorl, weaving sticks, looms, cactus spine or bone needle holders, sharpened sticks, copper knives and axes, hoes and fishing paraphernalia, including nests, sinkers, reed-bundle boats or balsas and peculiar rafts which were paddled.

Throughout the whole territory along the coast the people deformed the heads of their infants by applying pressure to the forehead, probably by means of bandages and pads, which process flattened the back of the head as well. They did not practice filing, cuttin gor chipping the teeth or other mutilations which would leave marks on the skeletons. tl is interesting to know that these natives seem to have been comparaments before the "dvent of the white ment although they suffered from several peculiar local diseases affecting the hip sone, the mend and the ear-
